The problem solving process is used to determine the foundation of the problem (building-level, classroom, grade or discipline, or student level). It generally has four stages, problem identification, problem analysis, intervention design, and response to instruction/intervention. It is grounded in the use of data to drive instruction and intervention.